

JBJS, Inc. Journals Confidentiality and Embargo Policy

Revised March 30, 2017

It is the responsibility of all authors of articles submitted to any and all publications of JBJS, Inc., to abide by the embargo policy.

The embargo means that information concerning or contained in your article cannot be discussed with the media, published, broadcast, posted online, or otherwise placed in the public domain until after the embargo is lifted. It is your responsibility to ensure that all co-authors are aware of this policy.

Peer review and editing may result in manuscript changes that affect the interpretation of results, conclusions, statistics, and even the number of subjects included in the study as published, so a premature release of information may result in dissemination of incorrect information. All research findings from the article must be kept confidential unless specific permission is granted by the Editor-in-Chief or the CEO.

An exception is in place for presenting the results of research on which the article is based at a professional conference. However, the status of articles remains confidential until published. This means that while authors may cite and/or refer to the work as “under review” or “in press,” they may not discuss the fact that the research has been submitted, under review, or accepted for publication by a JBJS, Inc. journal. Do not distribute copies of the manuscript, tables, or figures.

Embargo Dates and Times

Embargo dates correspond to the publication date of the issue or article when they are posted electronically. Supplements are published along with an issue and reflect the same embargo date and time of that issue.
